

Bisexuality means attraction to people of more than one gender.

But what is it like to be bisexual in the workplace?

In the Civil Service LGBT+ Network, we want everyone to feel included and valued for who they are. However, we know bisexual civil servants feel less included than their gay and heterosexual peers.

Bisexual civil servants

Want a greater sense of community, having felt excluded from both 'straight' and 'LGBT+' spaces.

As a result, we are Running dedicated, social and supportive events and an online community space for bisexual civil servants.

Feel invisible as a result of a lack of recognition and role models in the workplace and wider society.

Raising the profile of bisexual civil servants, including senior role models, and support departmental LGBT+ networks and HR teams to monitor, recognise and support minority sexual identities.

Face negative stereotypes, assumptions, and feel over-burdened with questions about their identities and wider equality issues.

Providing knowledge, information and support to individuals, networks and departments.

Are more likely to experience bullying, discrimination and harassment.

Investigating how training and guidance can be developed or improved within the wider Civil Service and also within LGBT spaces.

Can face multiple barriers to full participation in the workplace, due to other aspects of their lives and identities in interaction with their sexual orientation.

Working with other Civil Service diversity networks and organising joint initiatives.

If I tell my colleagues I went to visit my girlfriend last weekend, they may assume that I identify as lesbian. It could be uncomfortable to have to add 'but I'm also attracted to men', or 'I've also had male partners', or even 'but I'm not gay I'm bi'. It's important to avoid making assumptions about someone's sexuality if they have not explicitly come out.

What can Allies do?

Allies avoid making assumptions about a person's sexual orientation or gender.

Allies make space so that the quiet/unnoticed/missing voices can be heard.

Allies consider their own behaviour; ask for feedback, reflect, adapt and learn how to behave in ways that invite people in, instead of pushing them away.

Allies challenge constructively when they see something going wrong – an inappropriate comment or an interaction that is failing to build relationships.

Allies follow the appropriate bullying and harassment procedure if they become aware of biphobic behaviour.

Allies take into account that every bi experience is different and does not solely define a person.

Allies inform themselves and seek sources of information independently rather than assuming minority colleagues are there to inform them.

In society, bi women can often be fetishised. Bi men can be stereotyped as being closeted gay men.

It can be challenging to explain that it's a sexuality that exists beyond the gender of your partner, that you're not flipping between two binary states.

It can be a struggle of being not quite gay enough or not quite straight enough, resulting in exclusion and feeling like you don't quite belong anywhere.

I don't know why it matters but I don't want to be mis-recognised as something I am not.

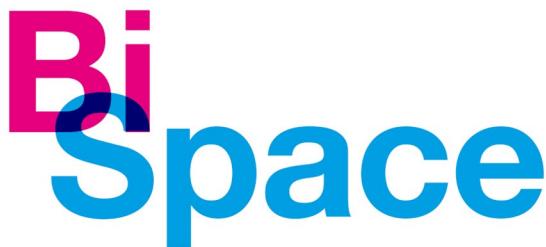

I have been seeing someone of the same sex for quite some time... I am incredibly hesitant to reveal this and constantly feel like I can't be my true self at work.

It's the repetitive process of coming out to the same people. I have to come out to enough people that actually duplicating the number of times I have to come out to a single person is just generating work!

I feel completely comfortable and have been out from starting in the Civil Service one year ago. Everyone on my team has behaved completely appropriately, as if it is no big deal – which for me, it isn't.

BiSpace is an initiative run by bi+ civil servants, for bi+ civil servants.

It's a chance to meet fellow bisexual, pansexual, queer and asexual civil servants in different parts of the country, particularly London, Bristol and Manchester.

What's in a name?

Bisexual

'Bi' means 'two'. Bisexual can mean attraction to two genders – men and women. It can also mean attraction to two categories – same gender, and other genders.

Pansexual

'Pan' means 'all'. Pansexual means sexual attraction to all genders, and avoids a binary idea of gender.

Bi Visibility Day

Bi Visibility Day is on 23 September every year.

It's to celebrate the bisexual community, raise awareness of bisexuality, and highlight biphobia and bi-erasure.

2019 marks the 20th anniversary of the day. Visit bivisibilityday.com to find out more.

I feel like I'm constantly managing where people are on the basis of my relationship with them – what they know, how comfortable I feel, what version of myself to put out in those different contexts, how safe do I feel with this person, how much of myself do I show? It is exhausting.
